"English Literature Students' Pragmatic Knowledge: Analysis of Strategy and Politeness of Refusal"

This study is aimed at investigating and describing English literature students' pragmatic knowledge in uttering English refusal statements in some different situations (request, invitation, suggestion, offering). The purpose of this study is to analyze and describe students' refusal strategy and politeness strategy while uttering English refusal. The participants in this study consisted of twenty-five undergraduate students, 7 males and 18 female, enrolled in second and sixth semester of English literature department of Universitas Diponegoro. The only instrument used by researcher in this study was questionnaire based on Beebe et al.'s (1990) work. The result of this research showed that students use direct and indirect refusal strategy. However, they prefer to use indirect strategy while uttering English refusal statements. It means that they respect their interlocutor even though in speaking English. In politeness strategy, they use two type strategies which are deference and solidarity politeness strategy. However, the students who have higher level prefer to use deference politeness strategy.
