Dear Asti

I'd like to introduce myself as one of the editors at Routledge Mental Health – we've recently received a proposal submission and would appreciate your feedback to guide our decision to publish. The proposal is for Muslims Living with Chronic Pain. Integrating Acceptance & Commitment Therapy with Islamic Psychotherapy (title tbc). Please find a short synopsis of the text below, I would expect the proposal review would take an hour maximum of your time and your thoughts will be hugely beneficial when it comes to guiding my decision to publish.

In terms of the health needs of Muslim communities in the UK, many standard pain management treatment programs fail to acknowledge the interplay of culture, spirituality and religiosity in the development and maintenance of psychological effects in chronic pain patients. The health needs of patients from culturally diverse backgrounds can only be addressed by breaking down barriers to receiving equitable pain management services and developing and implementing pain management programmes based on patient-centred care. This workbook uses a cultural/religious adaptation of Acceptance and Commitment Therapy (ACT), an evidence-based clinical intervention for supporting Muslims living with chronic pain. It complements the Book published by Routledge, Integrating Acceptance and Commitment Therapy with Islamic Psychotherapy for Managing Chronic Pain, written by Dr Razia Bhatti-Ali (2024) for therapists. This workbook will assist Muslims in managing the challenges of living with chronic pain using ACT while remaining aligned with their core Islamic values. The workbook begins by describing the ACT model of psychological flexibility (Hayes, 2006, 2014) while providing examples from the Quran and Hadith that connects with it. The workbook includes how Islam
